

Plagiarism In College & How To Avoid It

If you aren't familiar with the term plagiarism, let me break it down for you. Simply put, plagiarism means to write my paper or copy someone else's words, ideas or work. In the world of academic writing, it is a serious crime as you're taking someone else's work and presenting it as your own.

They say that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, but in academia, it's a crime. Don't create something that isn't your own because at some point, you will be found out.

If you are asked to submit a case study or paper project for college or university (academic writing), they want nothing short of perfection and originality. While it may seem awesome being able to copy off someone else and not worry about getting caught (or perhaps you have gotten away with it in the past) – ask yourself this question: Is it worth knowing you cheated on a paper just so you could get by? Sure, cheating may make schoolwork a little easier right now – but what about when you graduate and you realize that all of your accomplishments are nothing but a lie?

If you do get caught plagiarizing on an assignment, getting kicked out of school is the least of your worries. If you are found guilty of this serious offense, you can be prosecuted and sued for copyright infringement. Not to mention that if you get caught plagiarizing an essay, paper or report, not only will you fail – but your professor will think even less of you than they already do.

What's more, in order to include another person's work into it without giving them credit is professional essay writing service at its finest. Plagiarism also lowers the quality of the academic community as a whole and makes it harder for people who want to actually learn something new and contribute information through their own hard work.

Your future employers won't look at past accomplishments as much anymore because everyone knows you cheated on your papers.

About the worst thing that can happen is you getting caught plagiarizing in school, but there are much better things to worry about as well. Believe it or not but professors and heads of colleges aren't the only ones going through student assignments these days – many are now being outsourced to companies that use high tech software to check for similarities in writing style (in other words – they can tell when you cheat).

What if a company doesn't like what it sees and decides not to hire you? Maybe they've recently hired someone else who has an excellent reputation because they didn't fall into the trap of plagiarism. In any event, once you graduate and apply for cheapest essay writing service, you'll have to submit several samples of your work and class projects. You wouldn't want to potentially jeopardize your new career with a company would you?

I can go on for hours about the serious consequences of plagiarism, but that isn't quite what this article is all about. I want to help you avoid falling into this trap by providing some helpful tips and pointers on what it means to reference sources properly. While I am not going to get too deep into these details as they are well beyond the scope of an intro college paper, here are five easy ways that will help keep you out of trouble (and make your writing stand out).

One of the simplest things you can do is just add quotes and citations around the words that are not yours. For example, if you want to quote someone in an article, just write something like this: "John Smith says that..."

This is a great way to keep yourself out of trouble with plagiarism because there is nothing more obvious than seeing your own name used as a citation or reference point. If you see John Smith mention such and such in a paper and then later on – you too write my paper for me something similar – chances are good that your professor will notice the similarities.
